take longer than other dogs. This would only encourage you to rush through your training session. If you select short drills that will help you tackle your training goals, you will be well on your way to an efficient training session. Sometimes no matter how hard we try, we cannot seem to stick to a concrete training schedule with our dogs due to lack of time.

If you simply do not have time to train your dog, seek the services of a professional trainer. They may be able to take your dog to the level you desire and teach you how to maintain your dog's training. Before committing to a trainer and their services, make sure you ask them what kind of training is needed to maintain the new skills and manners that your dog will be taught. Also, ask how long training sessions should be after getting your dog back from your trainer. Sending your dog to a trainer may sound great, but if you cannot invest the time to maintain or continue your dog's training, then you will have wasted money and time by doing so.

During these busy times, family members must come together to make sure that their dogs do not get put on hold. If everyone in the household can do at least one dog-related chore and communicate when they cannot, everyone will be more organized. Taking advantage of the few minutes you may get with your dog is key to maintaining both your relationship and their training.

"I can't make any promises but, like, if you provide information that prevents something big, the government pays for that," one of the men told Brown. Brown said others have contacted him with similar stories after he went public with his story."

The article also references the planned kidnapping of Michigan Governor Gretchen Whitmer several months ago where it was discovered that F.B.I. operatives were instrumental in encouraging, planning and facilitating the plot. As reported:

"The FBI special agent that oversaw the Whitmer kidnapping operation was transferred to the FBI's District of Columbia office last year, where he is overseeing the Jan. 6 investigations.

As part of its anti-terrorism efforts, especially after the 9/11 attacks, the FBI has been known to target individuals in sting operations where its operatives played key roles. Critics have argued that without the FBI's involvement, there would never have been a plot to investigate in the first place.

FBI informants and undercover agents can be authorized to conduct some illegal activities as part of their assignments, according to Ruskin.

A Senate investigation into the Capitol intrusion concluded that a number of failures in the intelligence apparatus caused the Capitol Police to be unprepared for what took place. Given the numerous warnings and assurances of preparedness made before the event, how could this have happened?"

In a June 28th article by Julie Kelly in American Greatness it is described how some members of law enforcement attacked peaceful protestors with tear gas, pepper spray, rubber bullets, batons and even fists. As described by Kelly:

"Video obtained by American Greatness last month shows Capitol police throwing flashbangs into a crowd of protestors outside the building. The device, also known as a stun grenade, emits flashes of light and a sound louder than a jet engine. It can cause temporary blindness and disorientation; some flashbangs contain rubber pellets, which some protestors claim were the ones used by police on January 6.

"They've been throwing flashbangs, shooting us with bullets," Kash Kelly said on the
